

Photo courtesy of The College Republicans.

A group of politically active students takes time during a trip to Washington, D.C. to snap a picture in front of the Capitol Building. Many political groups were especially active during this election year. >

Waving from their Homecoming float, a group of fraternity brothers enjoy the festive atmosphere. Greek life was an integral part of many students' lives on campus and even alumni's lives after graduation. >

Photo courtesy of Stephen Salpukas.

JOIN THE GROUP

The large number of staff of the College devoted to Student Activities made it clear to any visitor or prospective student the important role that organizations and Greek life played in the life of the Tribe. The ease with which new groups could be created, the opportunities for involvement in a variety of clubs, and the vast number of students participating in extracurricular activities proved that the College was not just a classroom.

Although service and outreach groups dominated, dance, cultural, media, a cappella and political organizations also abounded. Combined with the philanthropic and community activities of each of the Greek organizations on campus, it was clear that the Tribe really knew how to join the group.

—>Meredith Howard