

A young Emily Johnson, a senior at the College, smiles for the camera. As seniors prepared to move into a new chapter of their lives, nostalgic parents sought to remember their children as they once were. ^

Posing for a picture the weekend of graduation, senior Joan Bowlen and her family gather around the sundial in New Campus. Despite the many distractions and activities of their last weekend, soon-to-be graduates spent time with their parents around the popular sites of the campus. >

REMEMBER YOUR ROOTS

Glancing back over the past four years, seniors often found their time at the College to be characterized by memories of stressful nights, new and lasting relationships, and the occasional wild party. Most agreed, however, that their time at the College had gone by much too quickly. Similarly, parents of the soon-to-be graduates marveled at the speed with which their children had grown into young men and women ready to go out into the world on their own.

A time of reminiscing and memory, the last year for Tribe seniors had to be lived to its fullest potential, taking every opportunity to do those things they had neglected to do in previous years and to set down roots with which to remember the College.

—>Meredith Howard