Bicentennial Celebration Feb. 2

Rassias, Brod To Examine Language Education

"Most people's experience after studying one year of French is that they can't even order a french fry," says Ronald A. Hallett, professor of modern languages.

But it's a different case with the foreign language students at the College, who can often order a six-course meal in French after only a year of study. First-year language courses are taught using the Dartmouth Intensive Language Model, a teaching method which literally plunges students into the language and culture of another country.

Next Saturday, Feb. 2, the creator of the Dartmouth model, John A. Rassias, will address his William and Mary colleagues along with language professors from all over Virginia during a day-long celebration of the bicentennial anniversary of the creation of the first chair of modern languages in America at William and Mary.

Rassias, professor of Romance Languages at Dartmouth College, created the Dartmouth method to help speed the learning of his first-year foreign language students. Rassias will speak on "The Cause of Languages" at 1:30 p.m. in Phi Beta Kappa Memorial Hall. Richard I. Brod, director of foreign language programs of the Modern Language Association (MLA), will speak on "Language and Liberal Education."

Both men are committed to the development and improvement of foreign language education and are excited by the widespread acceptance of the Dartmouth method, according to Franco Triolo, associate professor of modern languages and chairman of the bicentennial coordinating committee.

"The best thing about the Dartmouth method is that it's exciting," says Hallett, "and it works." Students learning a foreign language for the first time perform skits in class using the phrases they have studied.

"We find that a number of our students are going on to do exciting things with their knowledge," he says. At Dartmouth, Rassias and his colleagues began the practice of sending students to Europe after their first year of foreign language study. "With the Dartmouth method, you can learn the language well enough to go into a foreign culture successfully," Hallett explains. One of his first-year students went to Belgium and worked in a hospital for a year before coming back to finish her studies at the College.

Another benefit of Rassias's Dartmouth method is that it stimulates students in the otherwise difficult task of learning a language from scratch. "Some students even go on to take a second foreign language because they think it's so interesting, not laborious or painstaking," says Hallett.

The Dartmouth method, while unconventional in its use of drama, skits and real-life situations to teach languages, has received widespread support throughout the academic community. "If Rassias or anyone else can introduce a system for getting students involved in learning a language, that's good," says Brod.

Brod, who says he will speak on the future of modern languages at the seminar next weekend, cites the recent report of the President's Commission on Foreign Languages and International Studies as proof that language teaching needs new approaches. "The real problem," he adds, "is getting students to take a language before they get to college."

The presidential report called the American incompetency in languages "scandalous" and cited a 10 percent drop in high school language enrollments since the mid-sixties. "Here's where I think colleges and universities should get involved," says Brod, adding that university professors should take "collective action" in working for the improvement of "the whole educational process, from the ground up."

Rector Named Top Administrator

Virginia Beach Public School Superintendent Dr. E. E. Brickell, Rector of the Board of Visitors, has been named one of North America's top 100 school administrators by the Executive Editor, published by the National School Boards Association. The announcement was made in the February issue, which was just released.

Dr. Brickell rose through the ranks of South Norfolk Public Schools from teacher and coach, to assistant principal, to principal, to superintendent of schools. He also served as superintendent of schools in Franklin, Virginia, and as administrative assistant to the president of the College of

$10,000 Goes To 'Women in Business'

The International Paper Company Foundation of New York has given the School of Business Administration an additional $10,000 grant to support the School's Women in Business program.

The grant is the second of a two-part, $25,000 commitment by the foundation to the Campaign for the College to promote development and expansion of workshops, seminars and conferences for women in business throughout the South.

A portion of the grant will support graduate fellowships to women in William and Mary's Master of Business Administration degree program.

"The grant will also help the program to expand its geographical outreach to more colleges and universities in more states," says program director Ms. Julia B. Leverenz. "Our November conference and December workshop at William and Mary were tremendously well-received." Additional Women in Business activities are planned for other parts of Virginia and the South, with speakers and specialists from local, national and multinational organizations participating.

Two upcoming seminars scheduled for April 28-30 and May 19-20 will focus on "Women in Management." Women students, women in established business careers and women contemplating business careers will have an opportunity for mutual exchange of ideas and information, says Leverenz. The object of the seminars, she added, is to assist students in gaining valuable business experience and to help executives learn more about the special opportunities for women in the business world.

The Women in Business program was initiated in May 1977 with a $100,000 grant to the business school from IBM Corporation. In 1979, the International Paper Company Foundation began providing support as well.

"We're hoping the programs can continue for many years because there seems to be a great need for them," says Leverenz.

'Organization Is Mobilization of Bias'—Morrow

"Organization is the mobilization of bias" and "reorganization is a contact sport."

So says William L. Morrow, professor of government, in a new edition of his book, Public Administration: Politics, Policy, and the Political System, published by Random House, Inc.

Morrow's major theme is that decisions of the public bureaucracy can best be explained by the forces of politics rather than by the principles of classical administration.

He believes that the essence of politics is embodied in the term "struggle." Politics in the public sector is characterized by struggles among groups and individuals over the right to control the nature of public policy. Administrative agencies are the results of these struggles -- each agency embodying one or more values or "biases" that have become officially sanctioned as public policy.

For example, agriculture agencies reflect the interests of the farm community, while commerce agencies reflect the interests of the business community. Transportation agencies usually embody the values of the mass transit industry.

Morrow applies what he terms a "marketplace analogy" to explain the roles of agencies in politics and policy-making. The highly technical character of contemporary politics has necessitated the transfer of vast amounts of policy discretion from legislatures to administrators.

Agencies, in turn, employ this discretion to strike bargains with interest groups and legislators, state and local officials, foundations, and individuals. These agreements are designed to satisfy mutually all parties to the negotiations, and result in the dispensation of money and authority in ways that reinforce agencies' power and authority. The problems of bureaucracy in modern society are not so much due to the bureaucracy itself as they are to factors rooted in politics, says Morrow.

The bulk of Morrow's book is devoted to the analysis of how many government practices actually enhance the power of the bureaucracy and weaken the effectiveness of chief executives, legislatures, political parties, and states and communities.

SPO Offers Classes for Foreign Students

This semester the Special Programs Office will offer a course which should be of interest to all foreign students. The class, "English as a Second Language," is designed to help both graduate and undergraduate students improve their composition and reading skills in English. Students will practice several kinds of expository writing including thesis/support, hypothesis, comparison/contrast, classification, and definition. The class will also work to develop such reading skills as skimming, scanning, thorough comprehension, critical reading, and analysis.

The class, which begins on February 12, will last for ten weeks. Class meetings will be on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, from 7:30 to 9 p.m. There is a $75 fee for the course which includes the text book, Writing as a Thinking Process, by Mary Lawrence.

In addition to the text, there will be supplementary materials including exercises, reading selections, discussions, and in-class essays. The size of the class is limited to ten students.

Questions concerning the course should be addressed to the instructor, Ms. Katherine Wolterink, at 220-0117.

For example, Morrow argues that the check-and-balance principle, which encourages conflict between the President and Congress on policy questions, amplifies the power of administrative agencies because it provides for no definitive "head" or "boss" of the bureaucracy. Similarly, the division of authority between national government and states allows federal agencies to make deals with counterpart agencies within states to promote their own pet projects. These projects reflect little or no concern for integrated, comprehensive planning.

Morrow provides similar critiques of such matters as professionalism, citizen participation, budgeting and organization.

Morrow's book also includes an in-depth treatment of the Nixon, Ford and Carter efforts to increase bureaucratic accountability and a fresh analysis of the union movement in public administration. The earlier edition was published in 1975.

Morrow, who received his doctorate from the University of Iowa in 1961, began his teaching career at DePauw University and joined the faculty of the College in 1971.

Robert T. Siegel

Hughes Lecture To Honor Ferguson Professor

Vernon W. Hughes, Sterling Professor of Physics at Yale University, will be guest speaker at a special program Feb. 1, honoring physicist Robert T. Siegel, former director of the Space Radiation Effects Laboratory, SREL, who currently holds the Walter F. C. Ferguson Professorship.

Hughes will lecture on a topic in Siegel's field, "Muonium and Simple Muonic Atoms," at 4 p.m., Friday, Feb. 1, in room 109, William Small Physical Laboratory.

Hughes received his Ph.D. under Nobel Laureate I. I. Rabi at Columbia University in 1950 and has taught at Columbia, the University of Pennsylvania and Yale, where he served as departmental chairman from 1961-1967. He has received an honorary doctorate from the University of Heidelberg, a Guggenheim Fellowship and the prestigious Davison Germer prize of the American Physical Society, among other honors.

Hughes is principally known for the first observation of the muonium atom. Muonium is a man-made atom in which the central nucleus is replaced by an elementary particle, the muon, which carries positive charge and weighs about one-fifth as much as the lightest natural atom, hydrogen.

George R. Healy, Vice President for Academic Affairs, will speak at 3:30 p.m., on the Walter F. C. Ferguson Professorship, which honors a member of the class of 1919.

The Ferguson Brothers Fund, in memory of George Oscar Ferguson, Jr., class of 1907; William C. Ferguson, class of 1916 and W. F. C. Ferguson, provides financial assistance on an equal basis to the departments of biology, chemistry, mathematics, physics and psychology for the purchase of books for the libraries of those departments.

Siegel got his education as a physicist at the Carnegie Institute of Technology, now the Carnegie-Mellon University, where he went from undergraduate to associate professor. Along the way he obtained his D.Sc. degree with a dissertation on an experimental study of the three-photon annihilation of positronium under Sergio DeBenedetti.

In 1963 he came to William and Mary as professor of physics. From 1964-1967 he was Dean of Graduate Studies and for the next 12 years Director of SREL. During those busy years he continued his work on muon physics.

His reputation as physicist, teacher and administrator has won the respect and admiration of colleagues throughout the world and resulted in his membership on numerous international panels and committees. Now that SREL has ceased operation, Siegel has returned to full-time teaching and research.
