Reves commits $3 million for Center

Wendy Reves, a native of Texas now living in France, has made a $3 million commitment to endow the College's Center for International Studies.

Mrs. Reves made the commitment in memory of her late husband, Emery Reves, a Hungarian-born publisher and financier with a long-time interest in international peace and world order. He was the author of two books on the subject in the 1940s, one of which, The Anatomy of Peace, became an international best seller. He died in 1981.

The Reves gift will serve as a permanent endowment for all of the center's activities. It will be used to establish a distinguished visiting scholar-in-residence program and to fund academic conferences, library acquisitions, multimedia resources, academic research and scholarships. The endowment will also be used to establish a peace prize recognizing an individual who embodies Emery Reves' writings on international peace.

"Mrs. Reves' magnificent commitment could not have come at a better time for the Center for International Studies," said President Paul R. Verkuil. "Her support permanently endows the center and paves the way for an academic program of the highest order."

"As more and more students and faculty members seek an international dimension to their educational capabilities, the center must grow in response to that demand. Mrs. Reves' foresight will enable the center to reach its highest goals in international learning, teaching and research," he added.

James A. Bill, director of the Center for International Studies said the gift is "a generous gesture of support in memory of Emery Reves, a man who already a half-century ago diagnosed brilliantly the political causes of war and international conflict."

Bill added that the Reves endowment is "a giant boost for our program, which seeks to build international understanding through the intensive study of foreign languages, cultures, economies and political systems. It will assist us in the recruitment of bright and interested students, leading scholars and distinguished guest lecturers in the field of international affairs."

The Center for International Studies at William and Mary brings together several programs in one organization. It serves as a coordinating office for the undergraduate interdisciplinary major in international studies, in which students may concentrate in East Asian, Latin American or Russian/Soviet studies or in international relations. A minor is offered in African studies.

In addition, the center oversees the operation of the university's study-abroad programs in France, England, Scotland, West Germany, the Netherlands Antilles and the People's Republic of China. It is also involved in helping to attract foreign students to campus for exchange programs and full-time enrollment.

Tyler Hall is being renovated this year to house both the center's offices and many of the students participating in its programs.

Mrs. Reves said that William and Mary's Center for International Studies "embodies the spirit of Emery's intellectual interests and ideas. By supporting the center, I am pleased to help William and Mary realize the dream so central to Emery's life and career; and a dream of mine also comes true."

Mrs. Reves became interested in supporting international studies at William and Mary through her contact with Williamsburg friends sharing her late husband's commitment to international peace. Frank Shatz, a columnist for The Virginia Gazette, told Mrs. Reves about the university's plans for the Center for International Studies. Another friend, George Tayloe Ross, also encouraged her to visit the campus and consider supporting the center. Ross has established an endowed lecture series on international peace at William and Mary, which will begin in the spring.

A native of Marshall, Texas, Mrs. Reves was one of New York's most successful fashion models when she met her husband in 1945. After leaving the United States in 1949, the couple purchased and restored a villa in France, where they entertained extensively. Among their guests were Winston Churchill, Charles de Gaulle, Konrad Adenauer, Greta Garbo, Noel Coward and Somerset Maugham.

A naturalized British citizen, Reves invested in European industry after World War II. He was also founder and president of the Cooperation Press Service and Cooperation Publishing Company, an international syndicate publishing the views of leading statesmen. Before World War II, the syndicate's articles appeared in 400 newspapers daily.

Reves, who earned a doctoral degree in political economy from the University of Zurich, was the author of A Democratic Manifesto (1942) and The Anatomy of Peace (1945), the latter of which was translated into 25 languages. He was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize in 1950.

President Verkuil will recommend to the Board of Visitors that the center be designated The Wendy and Emery Reves Center for International Studies.

Works by Edmonds and LaPresti in Andrews exhibits

In the Andrews Gallery, from Jan. 11 through Feb. 19, will be exhibits by sculptor Nick Edmonds of Sharon, Mass., and painter Richard LaPresti from New York City.

Edmonds, a recipient of a Fulbright grant to study in Japan, was strongly influenced by Japanese art. He constructs his wood sculpture using Japanese joinery, and one can see immediately the Japanese landscape in his work in walnut, titled "Moon I."

LaPresti, a graduate of the Pratt Institute, paints multifaceted compositions on the beaches of New York, New York City's Coney Island and Long Island. These works, by an artist that critics agree is an excellent colorist, capture the beach's light and mood while sensitively registering the way people recline, stand and move.

Also at the gallery, some of Edmonds' drawings will be displayed for study. "Gold Rocks" is a fine example of Japanese brushwork. Edmonds' work has long been celebrated and was recently made the subject of a film by Peter Hoving, titled "Wood Sculptor Nick Edmonds," shown on national TV and in movie theaters for the nation's bicentennial.

Wright plans field work in West Pakistan

Rita Wright

This spring, Rita Wright, assistant professor of anthropology will be part of a team of scientists excavating at the site of Harappa in West Pakistan, a city in the Indus Valley civilization. The excavations are supported by the Smithsonian Institution and the University of California, Berkeley. The project is long term, and the team has built a residential compound and permanent conservation and laboratory facilities.

Wright is especially interested in technology and trade patterns in the ancient Near East and South Asia. Her previous field work and research have been concerned with tracing the development of ceramic technology and trade, using analytical techniques originally developed for the study of modern ceramics. Her interests include economic anthropology, proto-urban development and state formation.

The team at Harappa will include scholars from a number of American universities as well as students and scholars from Pakistan. A team of physical anthropologists led by Kenneth Kennedy of Cornell University will investigate demographic questions pertaining to longevity, disease and stress levels; Mark Kenoyer of the University of Wisconsin, craft industries; and Richard Meadow of Harvard University, animal domestication.

Students and junior officers from the Department of Archaeology in Pakistan will obtain conservation training and will assist in the field work.

Wright's field research at Harappa follows several other projects she has undertaken in the past. She first went to Pakistan in 1980 and also carried out field work there in 1981, 1982 and 1984. In addition to participation on the Harappa team, she is a member of the Mission Archeologique de l'Indus studying the sites of Mehrgarh and Nausharo in Baluchistan. These sites are related to her research on the Indus Valley civilization. Evidence from these sites show a spectrum of developments, in which the inhabitants learned to domesticate plants and animals, developed a highly sophisticated ceramic industry and engaged in extensive trade with other cultures. In the latest occupations of these sites, artifacts from the Indus Valley civilization have been found. This project is directed by Jean-François Jarrige, director of the Musee Gimet, Paris.

Wright also has conducted field research in southwestern Iran at Anshan, the ancient capital of the Elamite civilization (ca. 2000 B.C.). This project was sponsored by the University of Pennsylvania Museum.

Other field work has been in Afghanistan, where she conducted an archaeological survey along the northeastern frontier in Badakshan, Takhar, Kunduz and Baghlan provinces. This project included a survey of an archaeologically unknown area. Its goal was to locate sites along the route to the world's largest mine of lapis lazuli, a commodity found throughout the Near East, especially in Mesopotamia in the third millennium B.C.

Since 1985 Wright has been a research associate at the Smithsonian Institution, where she conducts her laboratory analyses on ancient ceramics. These studies are part of collaborative projects with the French C.N.R.S., the Italian ISMEO and the Smithsonian.

Wright also has conducted laboratory analyses at the Brookhaven National Laboratory, department of chemistry. This research included neutron activation analysis, a technique that provides a chemical "fingerprint" useful in determining the location of ceramic manufacture.

A Harvard graduate, Ph.D. in 1984, Wright's dissertation involved a study of technology, style and craft specialization as keys to patterns of interaction and exchange among ancient cultures in eastern Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan and the Oman Peninsula.

Talk to Town and Gown

In a talk recently on campus to the Town and Gown Luchceon group, Wright discussed trade and politics in the ancient Near East during the third millennium B.C. She presented evidence from several civilizations that were present in the Middle East at 2200 B.C.

In her talk Wright emphasized the tremendous cultural diversity that existed in ancient times and that is mirrored in the present. She believes that a knowledge of this past diversity is essential to understanding international relations in the region today.

"I do this not as an idle, academic exercise," Wright told her audience, "but because as an anthropologist and a historian, I believe that one way of avoiding the kind of oversimplification about the Near East that runs rampant today is to sort of unpack the history of the region and to observe the development of ancient, and in some cases, persistent traditions."

She noted that the tremendous cultural diversity present in the past and in the present is due, in part, to geographical features. These features include an "uneven distribution of promising agricultural land, its corollary in the distribution of population, and the availability of natural resources."

"Directly related to this cultural diversity and differential distribution of resources are various social and economic tensions which are of a long-standing nature. The centers of power that exist today are the same as those that existed in the ancient past.

"Although the details of the essential geographical features differ (we now have the factor of international markets for oil not known in the ancient past) and cultural diversity may have decreased slightly (the incursion of Islam surely has served as a unifying force, although such religious ecumen was present at various times in the ancient past), there are structural similarities.

"The key players are the same and they are involved in a complex game involving diplomacy and maintenance of trading partnerships. Their concern is to keep essential sea and land routes open and accessible, and they do this with a deep-seated knowledge of their ancient past and the numerous strategies that may be employed to accomplish the task.

"The Shah always was sure to establish his links with the Persian Empire, as he held anniversary parties to celebrate the connection between the Pahlavi Dynasty and the Persian Empire at the ancient site of Persepolis. The Iraqis, on their side, continue in attempts to restore themselves to the central key place in Middle Eastern politics, trade, and diplomacy."

With a series of slides and maps, Wright outlined the civilizations in the region including ancient Egypt, Mesopotamia, the proto-Elamites, the Sumerian, the Namazga civilization in southern Turkmenia and the Ebla civilization in northern Syria.

"As an archaeologist," she concluded, "I am not prepared to present you with a solution, but instead have described the long-standing nature of the problem. This build-up of tensions has literally smoldered for millennia. History is not determinative but it certainly is suggestive. As an archaeologist, when I look at this replica of a Sumerian boat built by Thor Heyerdahl floating on the Persian Gulf, I think of the American astronaut who when he looked back at the Earth from outer space for the first time, was struck by his own sense of an essential oneness with humanity, rather than as an American in opposition to the rest of the major nations. He also was struck by his smallness in the scheme of things.

"And when I look at the Sumerian boat, I think of the Bridgeton, a small boat, floating in an ancient field of diplomacy. The 20th-century modern state and United States diplomacy represent about 20 seconds in the scheme of ancient history. We need to keep this in mind and to permanently set to rest a tendency to oversimplify the complexity of the issues. And in a similar vein, we mustn't overestimate our own abilities to resolve these ancient problems."
