Biologist returns after year in Colorado as ACE fellow

Larry Wiseman, chairman of biology, is back on campus after a year away as an American Council on Education Fellow at the University of Colorado. His life, he asserts, will never be quite the same.

The ACE Fellowship gave Wiseman access to the movers and shakers in higher education across the county. His mentor was one of the youngest presidents of a large teaching and research university, a dynamic leader who has developed a public persona in Colorado any politician would envy.

Wiseman spent a week in Taiwan, Hong Kong, and visited mainland China, the guest of the Taiwan government who wanted to learn about higher education in the United States. He toured the only medical school in the world where western medicine and traditional Chinese ways are taught side by side.

He attended three national conferences and a series of mini-conferences for Fellows to meet with top administrators at the University of California, Berkeley, the University of Texas, the University of Virginia and other colleges and universities around the country.

ACE Fellows tested their mental acumen with computerized simulations of administrative problems and sought answers to budgetary questions under the tutelage of financial experts.

Wiseman organized a post-fellowship for himself with the State Council of Higher Education in Virginia because he wanted to know more about the Virginia system so he could compare the two.

Wiseman was made a Special Assistant to the President at Colorado after the first semester. The history department at Colorado adopted him and provided him with an insider's view of academic life from a discipline outside his own.

He saw how the president and Board of Regents of a large university reacted when student protestors, upset by the board's refusal to totally divest from South Africa, took over the board meeting. Afterwards he accompanied the president when he went across campus and into town to seek out students and start a dialogue about the issues involved.

Wiseman found that when he called a college president and asked for an interview the words "ACE Fellow" were like "open sesame," and he developed a network that stretches across the country. "I know now," he explains, "where to call for the answer to a specific problem." He has developed a valuable experts list.

He logged enough airline miles that he can take his wife on a free trip to Australia and New Zealand.

How do you follow such a heady year? One thing that makes it easier, says Wiseman, is his affection for William and Mary, his colleagues and the students and the fact that he picks up with renewed vigor the administrative duties of chairman that he left when he accepted the fellowship.

"One thing I have seen in my travels, and I have talked to a great number of presidents, is that many major universities with excellent graduate programs and research facilities, are now beginning to focus their undergraduate programs.

"We are lucky here at William and Mary because we have never stopped addressing our undergraduate program. During the 1960s and '70s when schools were dropping requirements and taking a supermarket approach to education — students walked in and took what they wanted without any program in mind — we didn't go along, and that is one of the reasons we have such high visibility now.

"When I traveled around and told people I was from William and Mary, they told me how impressed they were with the school. That I think comes from our reputation of delivering a really stellar undergraduate education. I am convinced that we must never let up on our devotion to the undergraduate.

"I am all in favor of quality graduate programs at William and Mary, but we always have to keep in mind that the hard-core undergraduate education has made us what we are."

Wiseman says that his year away has strengthened his interest in administration and his belief that faculty members need to be better tuned into the workings of their universities.

"People go into the ACE program for a number of different reasons. Some come from a small university and want to see how a big one operates. Others know they are specifically interested in some aspect of administration, finances, student activities, etc. When the president of the University of Colorado asked me at our initial interview what I was interested in studying, I told him I wanted to study him. I wanted to see the personality and style of leadership successful in a big, complex university. How do you organize things, be aware of everything that is going on? How does a president cope who has over 40,000 students and four campuses?

Wiseman found out by putting in 6 a.m. to 11 p.m. days with President E. Gordon Gee who is the youngest president of an AAU institution. His charismatic style and distinctive bow tie and suspenders have made him instantly recognizable.

He recalls commencement day as a particularly hectic one. After giving the commencement address, Gee spent the entire day moving from one group to another all around Boulder, shaking hands with students, parents and as many people as he could find who were in town for the big event. Wiseman acted as his chauffeur on a number of occasions, just for the opportunity to spend more time with him. Four days of each month were set aside for one-day visits to each campus meeting with top administrators, faculty members, student leaders and staff members, a range that Wiseman describes as "a vertical slice through the entire university governance."

"I found several people who said they would rather be provost or vice president for academic affairs than president," said Wiseman. "The president is constantly in the spotlight, especially at a large university. Everything he or she does is seen by the public and every time they make a decision someone is dissatisfied. That is probably why the average tenure for a president is just five to six years.

World congress of anthropologists names Zamora v.p. of IUAES

Mario Zamora, professor of anthropology, had an active role in the recent International Congress of Anthropological and Ethnological Sciences held in Zagreb, Yugoslavia, this summer and attended by an international audience of over 3,000 delegates representing more than 90 countries.

He organized three symposia and was elected a vice president of the International Union of Anthropological and Ethnological Sciences. He was also honored for his contributions to anthropology by the President of IUAES.

Zamora will serve a five-year term. He has just completed a five-year term as a member at large.

At a meeting of the General Assembly of the 12th IUAES at the University of Zagreb, Zamora was one of 10 to be presented scrolls and plaques in appreciation for their contributions to anthropology and the congress. Other recipients included Cyril Belshaw, past president of the World Congress and former editor of the world anthropology journal Current Anthropology, and Dr. Sydel Silverman of the United States who is currently president of the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research.

As one of seven vice presidents and a member of the executive committee of the International Union of Anthropological and Ethnological Sciences, Zamora will assist with planning for the next Congress to be held in Mexico in 1993. He will serve with representatives from the Netherlands, Brazil, Yugoslavia and New Zealand.

Zamora organized three symposia for the meeting in Zagreb. "The Anthropology of War and Peace: Conflict, Diplomacy and the Global System" was co-chaired by E. P. Skinner of Columbia University and Paul Magnarella of the University of Florida.

"Management Anthropology: An International Perspective" was co-chaired by Lourdes R. Quisumbing, Secretary of Education, Culture and Sports of the Republic of the Philippines. Dr. Quisumbing is also a sociologist, anthropologist and educator.

In this session Tomoko Hamada, who joins the faculty of the anthropology department this year, read a paper, "Working with Japanese: A U.S.-Japanese Joint Venture." This was an ethnographic case study of a U.S.-Japanese joint venture company in Japan. In the abstracts volume prepared for the meeting, Dr. Hamada describes the paper as an analysis of the corporate behavioral patterns of the two multinational partners, American and Japanese. The study illustrates the importance of interpretive and comparative approaches to international business studies, "as culture prescribes our perception, interpretation and expectation."

Zamora read a paper on "The Development of Cultural Anthropology (1900-88) in the Philippines," in a session he organized on "Third World Anthropology: Education, Research and Application." Zamora arranged for several colleagues to chair sub-sessions of this symposium.

One session on the Tasa days of the Philippines,

Board of Visitors meeting held at Ash Lawn

President reports on initiatives in international education

A primary goal of the College of William and Mary is to encourage intellectual pursuits that will help the students of today become the global citizens of tomorrow, according to President Paul R. Verkuil. "We need to educate citizens who will be comfortable in the world at large, not just the communities in which they grew up," he said. "To do that, we must take the lead in encouraging international literacy among our students."

In a report to the executive committee of the college's Board of Visitors Saturday, Sept. 3, at Ash Lawn-Highland near Charlottesville, Verkuil outlined William and Mary's recent initiatives in international education both for its students and for education and business leaders in the Commonwealth.

Students are already moving into the newly renovated Wendy and Emery Reves Center for International Studies, "which will serve as both a residential and administrative gathering place for international programs on campus," he said. The center and its activities have been endowed by a $3 million gift from Wendy Reves in memory of her husband's contributions toward the cause of world peace.

Verkuil reported that James A. Bill, director of the center and a recognized authority on Iran, had just returned from a trip to that country where he witnessed first-hand the devastation wrought by the eight-year war with Iraq and met with political and academic leaders.

William and Mary faculty members have been particularly active this summer in developing the program in East Asian studies, said Verkuil. The college offers an undergraduate major or minor in the field and is currently involved in a two-year $300,000 curriculum development project in non-Western studies funded by the Ford Foundation.

"While William and Mary has offered Chinese language courses for about ten years, a variety of East Asian courses have been added, and a course in the Japanese language will be offered for the first time this fall," he said.

"All the courses we offer, however, cannot replace the educational value of experiencing another culture directly," Verkuil said. Increased foreign contact and study abroad programs are also under way, he added. Nine William and Mary students studied Chinese in Beijing last year, and nine more have recently arrived in China to begin a fall semester program. William and Mary students also study abroad in England, Scotland, France, Germany, Italy, and the Caribbean.

In addition to expanding its curriculum, William and Mary joined with the Office of the Governor this summer to sponsor the first "Commonwealth of Virginia Seminar on East Asia." Teams of business people, high school teachers and students from 25 communities throughout the state participated in the two-week program designed to foster international understanding and serve as a catalyst for a widespread educational program about the region.

The program also served as an orientation session for delegates to the Southeast United States/Korea Economic Council (KUSEC) meeting to be held this November in Williamsburg.

While the East Asia seminar was in progress, Verkuil announced that William and Mary's football team will become the first American participant in a new post-season bowl game to be played Jan. 8 in Japan. Called the U.S.-Japan Bowl, the event will pit the Tribe against a team of Japanese college all-stars.

"This will be the first time Japanese football players have competed against their American counterparts in an officially sanctioned event," said Verkuil, "and the players are understandably excited about this unique opportunity."

Verkuil also reported on the activities of a five-member college contingent that traveled to London July 19-20 to serve as the official U.S. delegation to the opening ceremonies celebrating the 300th anniversary of the Glorious Revolution, which saw the peaceful accession of the college's namesakes, King William III and Queen Mary II, to the English throne.

The delegation, which also included W&M Chancellor Warren E. Burger, Rector Hays T. Watkins, Society of the Alumni President J. Edward Grimsley and Professor Thaddeus W. Tate, attended ceremonies at the Houses of Parliament, where Queen Elizabeth II spoke of the Glorious Revolution as the event that heralded "an epoch of freedom under the law."

The ceremony launched a year of international celebrations. The college, has been designated by Congress as the U.S. coordinator of anniversary activities planned jointly with the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, and will begin sponsoring a series of events in this country, starting with an exhibit of William and Mary era paintings, books, prints, decorative arts and artifacts. "The Age of William III and Mary II: Power, Politics and Patronage," is scheduled to open this winter in New York and Washington, D.C. The National Endowment for the Humanities recently awarded the College a grant of $140,000 for this project.

Gifts to College top $10 million for second consecutive year

Private gifts to the College of William and Mary topped the $10 million mark for the second consecutive year, according to figures compiled recently by the Office of University Advancement. Gifts received during the college's fiscal year ending June 30, 1988, from all sources for all purposes totaled $10,066,394.

Two-thirds of the gifts came from individuals, with non-alumni accounting for 35.9 percent of the total, followed by alumni at 30.7 percent, corporations at 18.7 percent, and foundations at 14.7 percent.

Corporate gifts, led by major contributions from Anheuser-Busch and CSX Corporation, set an all-time record at $1.9 million. Of that total were corporate matching gifts of $370,769.

Gifts for current operations totaled $4,025,445. Of that amount, the William and Mary Annual Fund reached an all-time high of $1,921,282. A total of $6,040,949 was designated for capital purposes, including endowment, facilities and equipment.

Gifts of $100,000 or more accounted for nearly one-third of the total. Of the approximately 15,659 gifts received during the fiscal year, 13 were in six figures and one in seven figures.

The diversity of donors giving $100,000 or more was equaled by the diversity of programs they chose to support. Donors included a Richmond family foundation that established a professorship in applied science; a New York foundation which funded a minority professorship and scholarships; a New Jersey alumnus who endowed museum acquisitions; a Florida businessman who funded a new professorship in fine arts; the widow of an eminent statesman who provided an endowment for the Center for International Studies; a St. Louis Corporation which funded an athletic facility; and the estate of a former secretary to William and Mary presidents which supported the law library.

The increasing number of permanently endowed professorships qualifying for the state's Eminent Scholars matching funds has been especially helpful in attracting and retaining the finest teacher-scholars. The Eminent Scholars Program encourages the creation of privately funded pro-fessorships by providing state matching funds for income generated by endowments established for this purpose.

During 1987-88, endowments were established at William and Mary that will be used to fund eleven new professorships over the next five years in diverse areas including applied science, public policy, marine science, American studies, chemistry, music, fine arts and business administration.

Last year, 29 William and Mary professors received salary supplements through the Eminent Scholars Program. That number is expected to rise significantly in coming years as the college readies for a major capital campaign to culminate in 1993 on its 300th anniversary.

Wiseman plans article based on study of the presidency at Colorado

"I think it is important for all of us to have a wider view of university affairs so we don't throw out our leaders just because they make one decision that affects us adversely. A decision may affect a person or a department, but in the long haul both may be better off because the decision is going to strengthen the university.

"There is sometimes a basic mistrust between faculty and administrators," says Wiseman, "the 'we against them' syndrome. Some people have said I have gone over to the other side, wherever that is. We are all part of the same effort, we are just doing things in a slightly different way.

"I don't think a great dean is more important than a great faculty member, but it may be easier to find new administrators than great faculty members. There will never be a shortage of people willing to be administrators, but there may be a shortage of good people in administration who have a solid academic understanding.

"The best college presidents are those who have a thorough understanding and appreciation of academic concerns ... raising money and meeting people, that is extremely important, and you have to enjoy it and be good at it, but you also have to have a deep felt sense of how important the academic enterprise is; because if you don't have that you don't ring true to your most important constituency — faculty and students.

One suggestion Wiseman brought back for enhancing faculty appreciation by the administration is the idea of increased summer faculty teaching grants as well as research grants. With teaching grants, faculty could develop new courses, update an existing one or, for those in the technological fields, catch up with constantly growing developments.

Wiseman also took time to study the University of Colorado's recruitment effort with minority students, which is focused on a pre-collegiate program in local high schools. It is not unique, says Wiseman, but it is successful. Working with teachers and guidance counselors university recruiters seek out students. In addition to bringing them to campus for academic programs, they interact with the students to ease their introduction to collegiate life. Students are taken to plays, out to dinner, the opera, as well as to football and basketball games.

Whatever the future holds, says Wiseman, he is going to take advantage of the experience of the ACE program, which he enjoyed so much. A naturally energetic person, Wiseman is already thinking ahead to how he can capitalize on his ACE year. He plans to write an article on styles of leadership in higher education and use his network for problem solving in the future.

In the weeks before classes started, he finished co-authoring a book about balancing academics and athletics in higher education with John Thelin in the School of Education.

He is currently under contract for a biology 101 book for non-science majors. His writing style for this one reflects his energetic nature. Stylistically, he says, it is somewhere between formal prose and Jack Kerouac. There are more colloquialisms than you would expect to find in a textbook. "It is filled with analogies," says Wiseman, little stories, asides, even incomplete sentences for effect — the sort of things that would probably get me an F in freshman composition.

If he decides to go into administration, Wiseman says he hopes he can find something challenging and fun. If he opts after his term as chairman to go back to faculty status he will use the energy he might have put into higher administration into revamping his courses, thinking up new ones and spending time writing. It would be hard for him to do the same thing for an entire 30-year span, he says, especially after last year.

Wiseman got interested in the ACE program talking to Ann Die who was an ACE Fellow on campus two years ago. He was nominated by President Verkuil.

He reflects that his decision to enter the program is evidence of how his attitude toward administration has changed while he has been at William and Mary. "When I first came all I wanted to do was teach students, do research and publish papers. If someone had said I would become interested in academic leadership I wouldn't have known what they were talking about. I wasn't even interested in going to faculty meetings. ... I had never heard of the American Council on Education.

"After I became chairman six years ago I found that lots of the things I did in this office were interesting to me. I still get pleasure out of enabling people, helping people in my department or through committees I'm on, empowering them to accomplish the kinds of things that are good for them and the institution.

"I went to a week-long workshop the American Council on Education had for department chairs and I met some interesting people who talked about broader issues than those in their department, and I think that was what got me interested in the possibility of doing this fellowship.

W&M rates well in new book

A new book that rates the top 100 state-supported universities and colleges in the country rates William and Mary on its honor roll.

How to Get an Ivy League Education at a State University by Dr. Martin Nemko, former professor at the University of California, Berkeley, lists William and Mary as highly selective and underrated. Nemko is now an independent educational consultant.

One of the smallest colleges on the honor roll, William and Mary is also listed as an institution with small classes. The College is also credited as "offering advantages for those headed to graduate school" and "a good situation for ethnic minorities.

The book lists William and Mary as a "high-pressure college," and a college with "excellent resident halls and resident hall activities." The College is also cited for its "especially beautiful" campus.

The University of Virginia, James Madison University and Mary Washington College are also listed among the nation's top 100 state-supported colleges and universities. The author used 11 criteria for judging schools from quality of students and faculty to class sizes and residential program. His information came from interviews with students and administrators as well as statistics about each school.

HELP UNLIMITED resumes operation

HELP UNLIMITED is back in operation. The program serves as a clearinghouse for volunteers and volunteer services and a liaison between the campus and community.

Volunteers are needed in a wide variety of areas. In the past, W&M students have worked as volunteers with such organizations as the Red Cross, Girl Scouts, Pines Convalescent Center, Eastern State Hospital, Child Development Resources and the SPCA.

Students wishing to do volunteer work can get more information by contacting HELP UNLIMITED at ext. 4129, or by coming by the office in Room 147 of the Campus Center, near Trinkle Hall.

Volunteer opportunities are also outlined in the HU Volunteer Newsletter which is published bi-monthly and is available without charge to all students.

Honors Program Film Series: "Citizen Kane" (U.S., 1941), directed by Orson Welles, Wmsbg. Library Arts Center, 4 and 7:30 p.m.

Volunteer fair

HELP UNLIMITED is sponsoring a Volunteer Fair Thursday from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Campus Center Atrium. Representatives from a number of agencies seeking volunteers will be on hand to talk about how volunteers can help.

For more information on the Fair, call Jeanna at ext. 4129.

Babysitters and tutors

HELP UNLIMITED is looking for students who are willing to babysit or tutor. Rates are negotiable.

If interested, please get an application at the HU office in the Campus Center or call Jeanna at ext. 4129 for more information.

Student accompanies Zamora to international meeting was chaired by Gerald D. Berreman, University of California, Berkeley. The morning session was devoted to heated discussions between the genuine theorists who believe the Tasadays are genuine stone-age tribe and those who believe they are a hoax. The British Broadcasting Company covered the afternoon session at which pro-Tasaday advocates explained their position.

Other sub-sessions dealt with Asian religious biographies, research and development of anthropology in various parts of the world.

At the session on Management Anthropology, Randolph Reynolds Jr., a William and Mary graduate, participated as a paper reader.

The discussions in these sessions and others will be published.

In addition to his active participation in the International Union of Anthropological and Ethnological Sciences, Zamora is an editor for Studies in Third World Societies, which is published by the College's anthropology department. He has also contributed articles on a variety of topics to scholarly journals both here and abroad.
