TO FARMERS.

A most excellent method to make Butter, which effectually prevents its changing color and becoming rancid.

The day before churning, scald the cream in a clean iron pot or kettle, over a clear fire, taking care that it does not boil over. As soon as it begins to boil, or is fully scalded, strain it, when the particles of milk which tend to sour and change the butter, are separated and left behind. Put the vessel into which it was strained in a tub of water, in a cellar until next morning, when it will be ready for churning, and become butter in less than the quarter of the time required in the common method. It will also become hard with peculiar sweetness, and will not change. The labor in this way is less than the other, as the butter comes sooner, and save much labor in working out the butter-milk.—By this method good butter may be made in the hottest weather.

The following method to preserve Peach Trees from worms.

Clear away the gum that issues from the tree affected by the worms, strew a little fine brimstone round the roots, and cover them with lime mould, that the brimstone might not blow away, yet so that the sun might operate through and cause the brimstone to fumigate, which destroys the worms. One pound of brimstone is sufficient for near 200 trees. To destroy Catterpillars, the end of a pole is split and a few lighted brimstone matches inserted under the webs where the Catterpillars take up their abodes at night.

To the Editor of the New Orleans Telegraph.

"SIR,

"I request you will insert an experiment I have lately made, which, if followed up by professional men and men of talents, may become of infinite use to society."

"From hear-say, which I did not credit, I having wounded a Turkey Buzzard, stuck a pin into each of his eyes, and was much surprised on perceiving the day after that his sight was as good as ever; I repeated the experiment on a second one, in such a manner as to preclude the possibility of its recovering its sight. My astonishment on the next day was great, on perceiving his was good on the preceding day. I observed that he kept his head under his wing all night; from thence concluded that the down on that part of its body contained the valuable matter which restored him to his sight.

"At this period, I had a workman named John Liver, who had been afflicted for a long time, with sore eyes, accompanied with an inflammation, so great as scarcely to be able to distinguish objects, and threatened in a short time, an extinction of sight; I procured some of the down from under a Turkey Buzzard's wing, and found that they had (after the application of the night) without any pain to him, discharged a thimble full of blood; the inflammation had disappeared, he has continued the same application, and finds his sight perfectly restored.

"LAVERGNE.

"Atackapas, Jan. 8, 1805."

A virtuous and lovely woman is the most charming object in nature; the most capable of affecting a susceptible heart, and of leading it to virtue.

GENEROSITY REWARDED.

OF all the graces that contribute to adorn the human mind, there are perhaps none more estimable than generosity and gratitude. To define the exact boundary between generosity and profusion, is not perhaps easy, since every one will explain it by the ideas they have of their own motives for action; yet how far soever avarice may have deprived some men of every spark of generosity, yet those very men fail not to expect it from others, and are sure to complain bitterly of those who do not display it in all their actions.

Nothing can equal the pleasure arising from the glow of a generous heart, which is prompted to a noble action, solely from the love of virtue, and who wishes not to make of it a worldly parade.

Fame is often purchased by generous donations, which would never have been given, had not popular idolatry been the main object in view; while others, like the generous man in the following tale, consulted only the approbation of his own honest feelings.

One of the caliphs of Egypt, being in the field of battle, was unexpectedly surrounded by a great number of rebels, who were preparing to give the fatal blow, which would at once have finished his life, and put an end to his mortal career. Fortunately for him, an Arab happened to be near the spot, with other soldiers of his party, who seeing the situation of the caliph rushed upon the rebels, and attacked them with such fury, that they were all soon put to flight.

The name of this Arab was Nadir, who had for some months lived a wandering life in the most retired and unfrequented places, in order to escape the vengeance of the caliph against whom he had joined the people in a late insurrection.

This generous conduct of Nadir was so much admired by all the Arabians, that the fires still relate it to their children among their evening tales. This adventure had the happy effect of perfectly reconciling Nadir to the caliph, who, charmed with the generosity of a man who had saved his life, at the very instant he might have destroyed it, promised to place in him an implicit confidence. "But, (said the caliph) let me hear how you have passed your time during your state of banishment."

"I have been a wandering fugitive, (replied Nadir) ever since your family were elevated to the throne of this empire, conscious that the sword of vengeance was at all times hanging over my head, it became natural for me to seek security in retirement. I found refuge for some time in the house of a friend at Basra; but fearing that my stay in that city might be dangerous, I one night quitted it under the favor of a diuiguie, and pursued my journey towards the desert.

"I had escaped the vigilance of the guards, and thought myself out of all danger, when a man of a suspicious countenance seized my camel's bridle, and expressed his suspicions, that I was the man the caliph was in search of, and for the apprehension of whom a very considerable reward had been promised.

"I answered that I was not the man he was in quest of."—"Is not your name Nadir?" said he. "This disconcerted me, and I could no longer deny myself to be the object of his pursuit. I put my hand into my bosom, and pulling out a jewel of some value, "Receive, (said I) this trifling token of my gratitude, for the important service I hope you will now do me, in keeping silence, and favoring my escape. Should fortune again smile on me, I will share my prosperity with you."

He took my diamond, and examined it very attentively. "Before I put this diamond into my turban, as your gift, (said he) I would wish you to answer me one question honestly. I have heard you have been a liberal man, and always ready to assist the poor and necessitous; but did you ever give away one half of your wealth at one time?" I answered in the negative, and he renewed his questions, till he came down to one tenth, when I replied, that I believed I had, at one time, given away more than one tenth of my whole fortune.

"If that be the case, (said the man, as soon as I had made him that reply) that you may know there is at least one person in the realm, more bountiful than yourself, I, who am nothing better than a private soldier, and receive only two dollars per month, return you your jewel, which must certainly be worth three thousand times that money." Having thus said, he threw me back my diamond, and pursued his journey.

Astonished at so benevolent and generous an action, I rode after him, and begged him to return. "Generous friend, (said I to him) I would rather be discovered, and forfeit my head, than be thus vanquished in point of generosity. Magnanimous stranger, either I must follow you all day, or you must accept of this tribute of my gratitude."

He then turning about, said to me,—“Were I to take from you your diamond, I should consider myself as a robber on the highway, since you receive no value for it. Let me advise you to lose no time, but make the best of your way to your proposed retreat." He continued inflexible, and we parted.

The caliph knew not which to admire most, the generosity of Nadir or the soldier. A proclamation was published, ordering the generous soldier to appear at the caliph's court, that he might receive the reward of his virtues; but all was to no effect, as no one came forward to claim the glorious reward. However, about a twelvemonth afterwards, when Nadir attended the caliph at a general review, a private soldier received a blow from his officer, for holding down his head as the caliph passed. This drew the attention of Nadir, who, after looking steadfastly in the face of the offending soldier, leaped from his horse, and caught him in his arms. To conclude, this proved to be the man who had so generously treated Nadir, and had endeavored to shun the reward of his virtues. The caliph paid him singular honors on the spot, and at last raised him to the highest rank in his army.

The Indolent Beauty.

WE too often see beauty contaminated by vanity, and a fine genius by indolence. Bella was the only daughter of a tender and affectionate mother, whose virtue and discretion were a source of happiness to her family, and a credit to her sex. Bella, on her arrival at six years of age, afforded every symptom of a good heart, compliance, affability, and a tolerable share of understanding. This was the glaring part of the picture; for she shewed a strange attachment to indolence, and a disgust to every species of refined education.

Though her mother possessed all the talents necessary for an excellent instructor, yet she had never before an opportunity of reducing them to practice, and an only child was not perhaps the most proper object for her experience in the science of juvenile education. It should ever be one important point with a parent, never to give up a command they have once laid on their children, but to insist on its punctual performance. The observation of this rule, would frequently save a great deal of uneasiness to both parents and children.

Her mother could not think of applying even the most tender correction, and the use of threatenings only added to her own uneasiness. She hoped, as her daughter grew older, she would become more sensible of her indolence and inattention to business; and, as she ripened in years, would proportionably increase in sense and judgment. But the older the twig grew, the less pliant it became, and what might have been accomplished in its younger state, was by time become almost impracticable.

Bella, however, when she arrived at eight years of age, shewed very little inclination to make any alteration in her conduct; the little creature's idleness rather increased than diminished, and she began to be troublesome even to herself. Her mother now conceived the plan of putting down on paper, every evening, the value of such things as she had lost or spoiled in the course of the day, in consequence of her carelessness and invincible indolence.

Her mother had flattered herself, that Bella, when she came to know the value of money, would act in a more prudent manner; but she read over the account with the utmost indifference, and considered the sums there mentioned as too insignificant for her notice and attention. A pretended head-ach was almost her constant excuse, to avoid her attendance on her masters; and thus, though naturally sincere, she began to accustom herself to deviate from the truth.

Bella had reached her thirteenth year, without the least appearance of alteration in her conduct, and the lost and broken account, kept by her mother, was increased to a large sum. One irregularity, if not timely checked, brings on others; and thus Bella, to indolence, soon added inconstitence. She presently grew tired of every thing; her harpichord, which was one week her favorite instrument, was the next discarded with disgust, to make room for the guitar; and this, in a short time after, for something else. She had masters to teach her geography, French and Italian, writing, accounts, dancing, drawing and music. These added to her mother's long catalogue of expensies, but contributed little to her improvement.

It is natural to suppose, that when the follies of youth are not early corrected, they will, like pernicious weeds, thrive so fast as to check the growth of every thing that is valuable in the same soil. Hence it happened, that after three years more had elapsed, the lovely Bella, instead of growing wiser by age, as her mother had vainly expected, became more indolent, whimsical, and capricious. All the money paid to her masters was thrown away, she learned nothing, and was in fact little more than an ignorant beauty; a character, I most sincerely wish, is not applicable to any of my fair readers, since nothing can be more dangerous, pernicious, and derogatory to female reputation.

At this period of her folly, a young gentleman of character and fortune, whom I shall call by the name of Honestus, among other company, visited the parents of Bella. He was struck with her charms, and immediately conceived some thought of paying his addresses to that capricious beauty; but, when he learned what was her character, he declined all thoughts of forming such a connection.

The tender mother did not fail to represent this disappointment to her daughter, who was then of age capable to receive remonstrances of that nature. To her natural disposition for indolence, she had now added pride, the forerunner of all evils to a female mind. Instead of properly feeling the reproaches of a tender mother, she haughtily replied, "It is true I have lost a great deal of time, and have not improved myself much from the lessons of my masters; but what need have I of learning, when my parents are so rich, and you yourself acknowledge I am so pretty?"

As soon as Bella had attained her eighteenth year, she began to think herself happy in being no longer incommoded with the visits of her teachers; for, when a young lady arrives at that age, she is supposed to be accomplished in point of education, and has nothing else to do but to apply herself to the application of those rules she learned from her masters. Alas! this was not the case of the lovely Bella: she had learned nothing but those principles which never fail to be pernicious to the youthful mind.

That morning, which on its opening appeared to her so delightful and brilliant, was soon enveloped in dark and heavy clouds. Her mother entered her chamber, with a countenance that convinced Bella something was amiss. After an awful pause, she thus addressed her daughter: "My dear child, you are this day eighteen years of age; but I fear your education is far short of what it now ought to be. I fear the indulgences I have granted you, have made you too vain of yourself, and have fatally induced you to believe, that you had less occasion for an education than others. Will beauty make you lovely? Separated from the graces of the mind, it will not so much as please. Are you not always uneasy in yourself, and constantly dissatisfied with others? Besides, rich as you imagine your father to be, are you sure, that while we are now speaking, he is not a ruined and undone man?"

These last words awakened in the bosom of Bella all the alarms, which an unexpected disappointment to ambition is capable of feeling. Her mother got up, and left the room without saying any thing more.

The apprehensions of Bella on this occasion were but too well founded; for, in a few days after this conversation, her father stopped payment. This imprudent gentleman, not contented with a fortune of six thousand pounds a year, engaged in a very hazardous undertaking, which happening to fail, brought on a bankruptcy. He had all his life been the child of fortune, and therefore made but a poor pupil in the school of adversity: he took this matter so to heart, that in spite of all the care and attention of his wife and daughter, he soon bid adieu to the cares of this world, and fled for repose to the next. He died perfectly sensible, exhorting those around him, never to give way to the emotions of avarice and rapacity, since these first brought him to ruin, and then to his grave.

His wife undoubtedly severely felt this shock, though she supported it with christian fortitude. She had a small jointure, which the creditors could not, nor did they wish to touch. Having performed the duties of the last funeral rights to her husband, she and her daughter retired to a private situation in the west of England, where every necessary article of life was cheaper than in the metropolis.

Bella, however, behaved with all the propriety that could be expected from a repenting daughter, and made every effort she was capable of, to console her unhappy mother. She would frequently reproach herself with her past negligence, and reckon up the vast sums of money that had been squandered away upon her to so little purpose.

Bella had valued herself much on the fortune she supposed herself born to; but it pleased Providence to deprive her of it. She had, however, her beauty still left to boast of; but even of this she was soon to be deprived. Be cautious, my youthful readers, how you place too great a confidence in the possession of wealth and beauty, since they are fleeting as the wind, and as unsteady as the vessel on the troubled billows of the ocean. Fortify your minds with religion and virtue, and a proper knowledge of the useful sciences; the storms and hurricanes of fortune may then attack you, but you will always safely withstand their rage, and deride their fury.

One evening, while she was bewailing her past neglect, and vowing a reform for the future, she was seized with a head-ach, and, being otherwise very ill, she went to bed. The next morning, a violent fever seized her, and a physician being sent for, her disorder was declared to be that which is frequently so fatal to female beauty.

It was one of the most unpromising kind; the doctors could say but little, and the mother was driven to despair. Day after day, and night after night, her mother never left her bed-side, but was constantly with her, in a state of uncertainty, worse than that of death itself. The afflicted Bella became delirious, the disorder made a rapid progress, and her eyes were soon excluded from the light.

Though this circumstance is not uncommon in this fatal disorder, and therefore did not at first create any alarm in her mother, yet at last it increased to such a dangerous height, that the physicians were no longer able to dissemble matters, and candidly confessed their apprehensions, that her daughter would be blind all her life. Judge if you can, what must be the feelings of a tender mother, on so trying a calamity!

However, youth got the better of her disorder, very contrary to the expectations of her mother, the physicians, and every one around her; she also recovered her sight, but there were left terrible marks on her face, of the devastation it had there made. As soon as she was able to walk about the room, she looked in the glass, and then exclaimed: "Ah! what is become of that lovely face, of which the proud Bella so lately boasted? Has cruel fortune robbed her of all she boasted, of all she valued herself for, but a month ago, her fortune and her beauty? I am justly punished, and I will patiently submit."

Bella, thus instructed by misfortune, soon conquered her indolence, and all her former imperfections; a sudden revolution took place, and her very nature seemed to be reformed. Her mother's conversation now became delightful to her, and she began to sit down to study with unwearied attention. Reading, music and drawing were her daily amusements; and so great were her improvements therein, that she soon made up for the time she had before thrown away in the most shameful indolence.

Her beauty was indeed vanished, but the improvements she made in her mind, procured her more friends than she was ever before able to acquire by the charms of her person. Her shape was still truly elegant, and her eyes and countenance were still expressive of the vivacity of her heart. She was no longer expensive in her dress, though she was always neat and fashionable.— Though her visitors did not look upon her with that astonishment as formerly, yet they soon became captured with the charms of her mind, and the politeness of her conversation.

Two years had passed away in this retired situation, when Honestus, who had long before ceased to think of making a partner of Bella, on account of her capricious and indolent temper, being on some business in that quarter, called on the mother and daughter to see them. He was introduced into a parlor elegantly furnished, and adorned with pictures. "Is not this (said the lady) a neat apartment? Every thing you here see, and these drawings in particular, are the works of my daughter."

Honestus was much surprized at hearing what he considered as a tale, and his looks expressed his incredulity. He turned round, and steadfastly gazing in the face of Bella, was equally astonished at seeing her so changed. "Is this the lovely creature, (said he to himself) with whose beauty I was once so much enraptured, and whom I forsook on account of her pride, vanity, and indolence!"

Out of politeness he entered into conversation with her, and found in her a most pleasing attention; before she was a beauty without sense; now she had lost the charms of her face, but had found those of the mind, which are infinitely the most to be valued.

Honestus passed day after day in the company of Bella, whose conversation was so pleasing and attracting, that he began to feel himself uneasy when she was out of his sight. In order, therefore, that he might enjoy the pleasure of her company without interruption, he offered her his hand for life. "You certainly deserve her (said her mother) since you refused her in the bloom of her beauty, when her fortune too afforded the most splendid promises, and now admire her when they are both for ever vanished."

Though the fortune of Honeſtus was not very large, yet it was ſufficient, with the aſſiſtance of his trade, to keep up a genteel appearance, and to provide decently for a family, ſhould ſuch be the conſequence of their marriage. They ſoon quitted this rural retreat, and returned to London, where they now live in the enjoyment of all thoſe pleaſures, which conjugal love, friendſhip, and virtue, are capable of producing.

Let my youthful readers reflect on what they have here read, and they will then become ſenſible, how vain and momentary, how fickle and inconstant, are the poſſeſſion of riches and beauty. They are like habitations built on the ſands of the ocean, which are perpetually liable to be ſwept away by the violence of winds and floods. I mean, not that fortune and beauty are to be deſpiſed; I mean only that they ſhould be uſed properly, that the poſſeſſor of them ſhould not vainly imagine, that they will ſupply the place of education, induſtry, benevolence, charity and virtue.

On Gaming.

IT is obſervable that Mahomet, in a particular manner, forbade gaming and drunkenneſs to his followers, when, at the ſame time, he indulged them with plurality of women. The laſt he looked upon as a paſſion, the ſeeds of which are implanted, as it were, in our nature; whereas gaming and drunkenneſs he abſolutely forbade, as acquired and unnatural vices; as vices productive of the moſt dreadful conſequences. I will not at preſent examine the juſtneſs of the compliment paid to amorous libertinism, which he certainly carried too far; but ſhall obſerve, that his ſtrict commands in regard to gaming and drunkenneſs, have contributed more than any of his other injunctions, to the happineſs of his followers.

Gaming (which I ſhall at preſent conſider) ſeems to me, of all vices, the greateſt enemy of happineſs; its inſeparable attendants are envy, deceit, profuleneſs, impiety, and a whole train of diabolical aſſociates. Health, peace of mind, love, family, friends, country, and in ſhort every thing valuable or deſirable, are ſacrificed to it. And to what then are they ſacrificed; Why, to avarice: avarice, the meaneſt of vices. The love of gaming, is nothing more than the love of other people's money. It is not the avarice of a miſer; it is the avarice of a thief, a robber, or rather the cowardly avarice of a pick-pocket. It is avarice and profulion joined together; a moſt unnatural conjunction, and productive of more terrible conſequences, than either of them, ſingly, can poſſibly be. Like Aaron's rod, it abſorbs, it ſwallows up, and contains within itſelf all other vices, and may juſtly, among vices, be ſtiled Legion; and of all baits made uſe of by the grand enemy of mankind, to tempt us from our duty, and make us unhappy hereafter; gaming ſeems the moſt dangerous, and the beſt to answer his diabolical ends.

It is ridiculous, to hear the votaries of gaming term it an amuſement, an inoffenſive relaxation, &c. Thoſe who ſomewhat it, muſt, notwithstanding, allow it to be an irrational, or unimproving diversion; and that at the best, it is but murdering time. But upon examination, every observer may find, that dallying with the temptation, draws on, imperceptibly, to the most destructive consequences. But what shall be said of those who take no delight in gaming, yet give into it on almost every occasion? Surely complaisance is a poor excuse for doing a foolish or a wicked action, and that every gamester is a knave or a fool, is a most palpable truth. A certain nobleman hearing a gentleman spoken of, who was said to be a great gamester. He is a most incorrigible blockhead, cries my Lord.— But on being assured he was a man of brilliant talents—If so, replies my Lord, he must be a rank scoundrel. Not so, my Lord, replies the other, he bears the character of a gentleman of great worth and honor. “That cannot be, retorts the nobleman: every gamester is either a rogue or fool, pike or gudgeon; and honor never makes a nearer approach to the heart of such a one, than the tip of his tongue.”

The male part of mankind, who give into this vice, prostitute their talents to the most vicious purposes; they become entirely absorbed by it; they stand like slaves in the market, to be bought and sold; for necessity often glares them in the face, and betrays them to venality.

If married, how can they reflect on the hazards they put the happiness of wife, children, friends, &c. to? And when ill fortune stares them in the face, how often are they so cowardly as to have recourse to a pistol, and by suicide, leave those innocents to confront a danger they themselves were afraid of facing? But when gaming seizes the female breast, to all the above misfortunes, we may add loss of beauty, which is ever the consequence of late hours, ruffled passions, and a corroding heart. Her honor, her chastity, can no longer be called her own, when she commences gamester. The mansion of gracefulness and beauty, is converted into a foul and darksome dungeon. Attracting softness and modesty (the amiable characteristics of the sex) are changed for unbecoming fierceness, and acerbity of temper, and the whole picture brings to our mind the different situation and figure of Satan, before and after the fall. These reflections (loose and undigested as they are) were occasioned by the following relation, which lately happened, and which probably several of my readers know to have but too much truth in it.

In one of the principal cities in England, lived Lucius and Sapphira, blessed with a moderate fortune. Health, love, peace of mind, and two little darlings, a son and daughter. They seemed to want for nothing, as an addition to their happiness, nor were they insensible of what they enjoyed; but with gratitude to Heaven, were instruments of good to all about them. Towards the close of last summer, Lucius happening to be in company with some neighboring gentlemen, who proposed to waste an hour or so at cards, he consented, more in compliance to others' taste than his own. Like other sporters, he met with a variety of fortune, (a variety more seducing than a continuance either of good or bad) and, warmed with liquor, he was inconsiderately drawn in before the company broke up, to involve himself more than his fortune could bear. The next day, on sober reflection, he could not support the thoughts of the distress his folly had brought on his Sapphira, and the little innocents; he had not courage to acquaint her with what had happened; and whilst in the midst of pangs, he had hitherto been a stranger to, he was visited again, and again tempted by one of the last night's company, to try fortune once more. In order to drown reflection, and in hopes of recovering his loss, he flew to the fatal place, nor did he leave it till he had lost his all; the consequence of which was, that the next day, in despair indescribable, after writing to acquaint Sapphira with what had happened, he shot himself through the head; the news of which deprived Sapphira of her senses. She is at present confined in a mad-house, and the two little innocents, destitute of parents and fortune, have a troublesome world to struggle through, and are likely to see all the miseries that poverty and servile dependance entail on the wretched.

ANECDOTES.

A gentleman having sent a porter on a message, which he executed much to his satisfaction, had the curiosity to ask his name; being informed it was Russel. "Pray (says the gentleman) is your coat of arms the same as the Duke of Bedford's? As to our arms, your honour," says the porter, "I believe they are pretty much alike: but there is a damned deal of difference between our coats."

At the last Coronation, a gentleman paid six guineas for a seat in Westminster-abbey: the instant the King entered, he turned to a gentleman beside him, and protested he was the greatest fool in Britain! "Indeed," said the gentleman, "how so Sir?" "Why, Sir, I have paid six guineas for a seat here; when his Majesty, who can much better afford it, comes in for a crown!"

An Irishman at an assize in Cork was arraigned for felony, before Judge Mounteney. He was asked who he would be tried by—"By no one, by J—s!" says he. The jailer desired him to say, by God and his country—"God d— my s— if I do!" says Paddy, "for I don't like it at all, at all, my dear!" "What's that you say, honest man?" (says the Judge)—"See there now!" says the criminal, "his lordship, long life to him, calls me an honest man, and why should I plead guilty?" What do you say (says the Judge, in an authoritative voice) "I say, my lord, I won't be tried by God at all at all, for he knows all about the matter, but I will be tried by your lordship and my country."

A Negro in the Island of St. Christopher's had so cruel a master, that he dreaded the sight of him. After exercising much tyranny among his slaves, the planter died, and left his son heir to his estates. Some short time after his death, a gentleman meeting the negro, asked him how his young master behaved—"I suppose, says he, 'he's a chip of the old block.'" "No, no," says the negro, "Mafia be all block himself."

The Miser and the Mouse.

To a mouse, says a miser, my dear Mr. mouse, Pray what may you please for to want in my house; Says the mouse, "Mr. miser, pray keep yourself quiet,
You are safe in your person, your purse, and your diet;
A lodging I want, which e'en you may afford;
But none would come here to beg, borrow, or board."

Scene in which MOODY gives MANLY an account of the Journey to LONDON.

Manly. Honest John!—

Moody. Measter Manly! I'm glad I ha' fun ye.—Well, and how d'ye do, Measter?

Manly. I am glad to see you in London. I hope all the good family are well.

Moody. Thanks be prais'd, your honour, they are all in pretty good heart; thof' we have had a power of crosses upo' the road.

Manly. What has been the matter, John?

Moody. Why, we came up in such a hurry, you mun think, that our tackle was not so tight as it should be.

Manly. Come, tell us all—Pray, how do they travel?

Moody. Why, i' the awl coach, Measter; and 'cause my Lady loves to do things handsome, to be sure, she would have a couple of cart-horses clapt to the four old geldings, that neighbours might see she went up to London in her coach and six; and so Giles Joulter, the ploughman, rides postilion.

Manly. And when do you expect them here, John?

Moody. Why, we were in hopes to ha' come yesterday, an' it had no' been, that th'awld weazle-belly horse tired; and then we were so cruelly loaden, that the two fore-wheels came crash down at once, in Waggon-rut-lane, and there we lost four hours 'fore we could set things to rights again.

Manly. So they bring all their baggage with the coach, then?

Moody. Ay, ay, and good store on't there is—

Why, my lady's gear alone was as much as fill'd four portmantel trunks, besides the great deal box that heavy Ralph and the monkey sit upon behind.

Manly. Ha, ha, ha!—And pray, how many are they within the coach?

Moody. Why, there's my lady and his worship, and the young 'squire, and Miss Jenny, and the fat lap-dog, and my lady's maid Mrs. Handy, and Doll Tripe the cook, that's all—only Doll puked a little with riding backward; so they hoisted her into the coach-box, and then her stomach was easy.

Manly. Ha, ha, ha!

Moody. Then you mun think, Measter, there was some stowage for the belly, as well as th' back too; children are apt to be famished upo' the road; so we had such cargoes of plumb-cake, and baskets of tongues, and biscuits, and cheese, and cold boiled beef—and then, in case of sickness, bottles of cherry-brandy, plague-water, sack, tent, and strong beer so plenty as made th'awl coach crack again. Mercy upon them! and send them all well to town, I say.

Manly. Ay, and well out on't again, John.

Moody. Measter! you're a wife mon; and for that matter to am I—Whoam's whoam, I say: I am sure we ha' got but little good e'er sin' we turn'd our backs on't. Nothing but mischief! som devil's trick or other plagued us aw th' day lung. Crack, goes one thing! bawnce, goes another! Woa! says Roger—Then, fowse! we are all set fast in a slough. Whaw, cries Miss, Scream, go the maids! and bawl just as thof' they were struck. And so, mercy on us! this was the trade from morning to night.

Manly. Ha, ha, ha!

Moody. But I mun hie me whoam; the coach will be coming every hour naw.

Manly. Well, honest John—

Moody. Dear Measter Manly! the goodness of goodness blest and preserve you.
